THIS MONTH IN AMERICAN REVOLUTION HISTORY

Battle of Red Bank (Fort Mercer) on October 22, 1777

After the capture of Philadelphia on September 26, 1777, and of the failure of the American surprise attack against the British camp at the Battle of Germantown on October 4, the Americans tried to deny the British use of the city by blockading the Delaware River. To that end, two forts were constructed commanding the river. One was Fort Mercer on the New Jersey side at the Red Bank Plantation; the other was Fort Mifflin. So long as the Americans held both forts, British navy ships could not reach Philadelphia to resupply the army. In addition to the forts, the Americans possessed a small flotilla of Continental Navy ships on the Delaware supplemented by the Pennsylvania State Navy.

General Sir William Howe, the commander of the British Army, sent 2,000 Hessian troops to attack Fort Mercer a second time. Rather than let the garrison be captured in an overwhelming British assault, Colonel Christopher Greene decided to abandon the fort on November 20, leaving the British to occupy it the following day.

REVOLUTIONARY WAR QUOTE

“[Captain Delaplace – Commandant of Fort Ticonderoga, May 1775] gazed at [Ethan] Allen in bewildered astonishment. ‘By whose authority do you act?’ exclaimed he. ‘In the name of the great Jehovah, and the Continental Congress!’ replied Allen.”

From Washington Irving, Life of Washington, Vol1, ch. 38.
